Procurement & Supply Chain

The Market

Employers' hiring confidence has increased, but mainly in relation to contingent staffing. Headcount remained stable due to the uncertainty surrounding the changeable economy, which also saw some candidates preferring the security of permanent opportunities. COVID-19 prevented new talent from entering the country, heavily reducing the number of available candidates for this sector, which typically relies on overseas candidates with specialty skill sets. As a result of the candidate short market, salary expectations increased, and employers adapted to meet these expectations to attract talent.

Certain sectors have experienced a higher demand for mid-level procurement roles, such as Government and ICT, and struggle to match the salary expectations of job seekers. In contrast, senior level procurement roles are more scarce but many job seekers are mainly interested in taking on a new role that progresses their career.

More organisations chose to partner with recruitment agencies as roles stayed vacant for months at a time, opting for a consultative search approach to hiring. This approach has become the norm over the past year and is expected to continue as the candidate short market persists.

Employers

Employers found themselves making more counter-offers and increasing salaries in order to retain staff as the market became more competitive and job seekers frequently received multiple offers. Fixed term and contract roles were extended to accommodate vacancies where recruiting permanent staff remained a challenge. Many organisations adapted to work from home expectations and the increased risk of COVID-19 by offering hybrid working and alternating teams when they were in the office.

Car and fuel allowances, completion bonuses, referral bonuses, and remote working were common benefits offered to attract new talent and retain staff. Recruitment has been a challenge for employers in this sector with tough competition, candidates demanding the highest salaries in recent memory and slow recruitment processes resulting in missed opportunities to hire available talent. Employers have met some of these challenges by becoming more open to substituting work experience for attitude and ability to learn.

Job Seekers

Due to the demand and competition in this sector, job seekers had the faculty to demand higher wages with better total remuneration and benefit offerings. It may have been the salary that would attract a job seeker but it was the benefits that confirmed their decision to accept a new role. Remote, hybrid and flexible working became an expectation post lockdowns and is now considered a minimum requirement when looking for a new role.

With employers expanding their benefits, and offering the highly sought after hybrid / remote options, job seekers rarely moved cities for a new role but rather were choosing to live and work remotely in more rural regions.

For some, permanent opportunities were seen as offering stability after an unsettling year, but others chose to see this market as an opportunity to earn top dollar, opting for contracting. Other highly sought after benefits in this sector included performance based bonuses, team culture, and special leave (e.g. study leave). It became more widely accepted that job seekers may move roles more frequently given the highly competitive market and with more people working in project based roles.

The Year Ahead

There will continue to be a large number of vacancies in the upcoming year as borders open and the candidate pool increases. Whilst the candidate pool may gradually increase over time, we expect that a loss in net migration will impact this sector, meaning the market is expected to remain candidate driven. Salaries are expected to continue to increase this year.

For procurement and supply chain roles in government, large projects will continue to put pressure on the already tight candidate pool. Salary and remuneration offerings may need to be re-evaluated and increased to attract top talent. Employers should consider their benefits on offer to keep up with competitors. Employers offering career pathways, training and development, opportunities for up-skilling, and who are willing to consider transferable skills will stand out in the market. Thinking creatively when considering job titles and experience will widen the talent pools.
